COPLEY, John Singleton

Boston 3.VII.1738 – London 9.IX.1815

Copley may have learned the elements of painting from his stepfather Peter Pelham, who died when Copley was only 14, and may have studied John Smibert's collection which had been assembled in Europe. Thereafter his artistic development was based on the study of a few works by Benjamin West available in his native Boston. By 1768 he was sending portraits (some in crayons) to the Society of Artists exhibitions in London. In 1774 he moved to London, where he remained apart from a trip to France and Italy. He exhibited at the Royal Academy between 1776 and 1812 (from Leicester Fields 1776–83; George Street, Hanover Square thereafter), becoming an associate in 1776 and a full member in 1779. Portraiture was an important part of his output, although after his arrival in London his attention and ambition shifted to history painting.

Copley's interest in pastel can be traced at least back to 30.IX.1762, the date of a surviving draft letter to Liotard (who was then in Vienna, but shortly returned to Geneva) to be accompanied by one from the Dutch artillery officer, cartographer and planter in Surinam, Jacob Hendrik Carel Spiering (1719–p.1774), who may have been introduced by John Greenwood (q.v.)

Sir, This Letter will meet You accompanied by one from the Worthy Coll: Spierring who has been so kind to give me his assistance for the obtaining a sett of the best Swis crayons for drawing of Portraits. allow me Sir to Joyn my solicitations with him that You would send as He directs one sett of Crayons of the very best kind such as you can recommend [for] liveliness of color and Justness of tints. In a word let em be a sett of the very best that can be got.

You may perhaps be surpris'd that so remote a corner of the Globe as New England should have any d[e]mand for the necessary utensils for practicing the fine Arts, but I assure You Sir however feeble our efforts may be, it is not for want of inclination that they are not better, but the want of opportunity to improve ourselves. however America which has been the seat of war and desolation, I would fain hope will one Day become the school of fine Arts and Monsieur Liotard[s] Drawing with Justice be set as patterns for our imitation. not that I have ever had the advantage of beholding any one of those rare pieces from Your hand. but [I have] formed a Judgment on the true tast[e] of several of My friend[s] who has seen em.

Indeed Cotes's portrait of Rivington was the only European pastel known to have been in America in the late 1750s; much of Copley's early inspiration must have come from studying prints and technical manuals.

We do not know whether Liotard ever received this letter, still less whether Copley managed to obtain a set of Swiss pastels. But evidently he had started to work in the medium, and in 1765 was receiving materials from John Powell, a colourman in London, including a box of "craons" for 15s. which Powell hoped "will Turn out agreeable as I Took the pains To Go To The maker" (the letter of 18.X.1765 survives in the group of Copley–Pelham papers in the UK Public Record Office, published 1914). A letter from a Captain Peter Traill of 7.III.1765 confirms that Copley had dispatched "a couple of pieces of [his] drawing in Crayons" by sea to Halifax, when the ship was lost and the pastel "became the prey of the barbarous Inhabitants". An invoice for a 1765 portrait survives, for a daughter of Joseph Jackson, for eight guineas (but billed at £11/4/-, and paid 25.III.1769).

Some five dozen Copley pastels are known, all executed before his arrival in London; they combine sophisticated observation with a certain woodenness of the autodidact. Technical analysis shows underdrawing of the basic outlines of the compositions, covered in pastels from a limited palette (occasionally monochrome) which by the mid-1760s became richer and more vibrant. He used light brownish paper, probably of European origin. He continued to work occasionally in pastel as his oil painting developed, and the c.1770 portrait of Ralph Inman reflects the unusual lighting of this phase of his painting. Some are signed with a monogrammed JSC.

The exhaustive statistical analysis in Prown 1966 shows a few interesting points about Copley's output in pastel, which made up only 14% of his American work. Three-quarters of the pastels were done between 1765 and 1770; 80% of these sitters came from Boston, and almost all the rest from Massachusetts. A significant preference for ordering pastels was evidenced both by Harvard graduates and by the high church and unitarian congregations at Brattle Square and King's Chapel, and, although less costly than oil portraits, pastels were favoured by wealthier families. Pastels were preferred by younger sitters (69% of them represented sitters between 20 and 40, while less than half Copley's oil subjects fell in that bracket). All of this suggests that Copley's pastels created or responded to a wave of fashion.

Did Copley continue to work in pastel after 1774? There is no firm evidence to support this, and Shelley (1995) argues that he was discouraged from doing so by the prevailing attitudes: Captain R. G. Bruce wrote to Copley from London, 4.VIII.1766, enclosing advice from Benjamin West and informing him of the positive reception of his portrait of his half-brother with a flying squirrel, adding that Sir Joshua Reynolds "condemns your working either in Crayons or Water Colours"...words, which, according to Bruce, "are confirmed by the publick Voice". West does indeed state that Copley should send him more oils, "and make it a rule to Paint in that way as much as Possible, for Oil Painting has the superiority over all other Painting." Copley responded to West on 12.XI.1766: "I shall be glad when you write next you will be more explicit on the article of Crayons, and why You disprove the use of them, for I think my best portraits done that way." Apparently Copley sent over a portrait (in addition to a "picture" for the Society of Artists exhibition) which Bruce acknowledged in a letter of 11.VI.1767: "Mr West has desired it may be sent to him, that he may see you Performance in Crayons." West does not however mention the pastel in his long letter of 20.VI.1767. From Copley's letters of 17.I.1768 to West and Bruce it seems that he sent two more portraits, on in oil, the other the pastel of a young lady for exhibition, "a plain head", apologising in one draft that he never saw "more than three heads done in Crayons." West's response, 20.IX.1768, merely urges him to come to England.

Moving to New York in 1771, Copley writes (16.VI.1771) to his brother Henry Pelham in Boston that "I want my Crayons much", instructing him "do see Mr Loyd, and find when Smith will sail, for I shall not be able to do long without them." They were sent on (11.VII.1771).

The Liotardesque hard-lit precision of Copley's pastels had become unfashionable by the time of his arrival in London (Reynolds, according to Bruce, had noticed an "over minuteness" in the 1766 painting, and, according to West, had initially thought the picture painted by Joseph Wright). Copley's description of a Raphael painting as having "the Softness and general hew of Crayons, with a Perly tint throughout" (in a long letter about painting to Pelham, written from Italy in 1775) suggests an artist who continued to value the medium (in another passage in another letter to Pelham, 25.VI.1775, he notes that "Titian's Pictures have something of the look of strong tinted Crayon Pictures, that kind of Dry look yet not meally"); but his antagonism was later evident when John Raphael Smith's admission to the Royal Academy was discussed in 1802: Copley opposed his candidacy on the grounds that "Crayon painting was not to be admitted into the Class of Painting". This, according to Farington (Diary, 1.XI.1802), "caused a laugh", since pastels by Cotes and Russell were hanging in the meeting room.

Le Portrait d'une Dame en pastel, par Mr. COPLEY, l'emportoit sur tous les autres par la fraîcheur & par la force d'expression sans dureté; mais il étoit inférieur pour le dessin à celui de COTES. Le buste a quelque chose de gêné, & d'étroit. Au reste le Peintre a peut-être suivi exactement son original. Il nous a donné aussi un Portrait en hile & en grand, qui est d'une maniere vraie & aisée. Mr. COPLEY n'est jamais sorti de l'Amérique.
