DULONGPRÉ, Louis

Saint-Denis, France, 16.IV.1759 – Saint-Hyacinthe, Québec, 26.IV.1843

Before his arrival in America in 1778 with the French navy, Dulongpré is traditionally believed to have studied art in Paris; there seems little stylistic evidence for this, although he may have studied music. In 1784, after the war, he emigrated to Montréal and three years later married Marguerite Campeau; at least 13 children followed. He appears to have had a number of enthusiasms, including music and theatre (he is described as a music teacher in some sources, and in 1789 he was the owner of a Théâtre des Sociétés which put on a production of Joseph Quesnel's operatta Colas et Colinette), in addition to a flair for portraiture for which he perceived a ready demand in Canada. In 1791 he was commissioned as a militia officer in Montréal. An announcement in the Quebec gazette of 10.IV.1794 advertised his skills as a painter of miniatures and pastels (to be carried out at Dillon's Hotel), claiming that he had "cultivated the art of painting portraits under the best academicians". From 1797 he painted numerous frescoes for churches in Québec. In 1812 he was recorded in the army. He moved to Saint-Hyacinthe in 1832 but risky investments reduced him to bankruptcy. An obituary notice attributed 4200 portraits to him. This may explain the rapid and somewhat perfunctory execution of those known today (which are mostly early nineteenth century). The artist has nevertheless benefited from extensive attention and detailed technical research.
