HAMILTON, Hugh Douglas

Dublin 2x9.XII.1740–10.II.1808

The son of a peruke-maker in Dublin (probably the William Hamilton, of Post Office Yard, Sycamore-Alley, perwigmaker, one of ten listed in the Dublin Directory for 1738), Hamilton's origins are somewhat obscure, and his date of birth was only first deduced from Dublin Society prize records by Cullen (1984). In 1754 he was apprenticed to James Mannin, a "pattern drawer" who two years later was appointed master of the school of ornament at the Dublin Society's drawing school, run by Robert West (q.v.). Here Hamilton received Dr William Madden's premiums awarded for drawings by under-16-year-olds: on 15.II.1753, he was placed in the fourth class (9s. 1d); the following year (14.II.1754), third class (£1/2/9). He took first prize in the 12.VI.1755 competition, winning a premium of £1/16/-. Finally (minute of 2.XII.1756, still for under-16s) he was in the second bracket, receiving 16s. 3d, while Thomas Hickey was awarded £1/10/-. (His future patrons, the La Touche family, were linked to the Dublin School – John and Peter won prizes there in 1746.) One of his earliest commissions (1760) involved decorating maps for the Earl of Kildare's estates; at the same time he made a series of drawings of Dublin street-vendors.

By 1764 Hamilton had moved to London, where he was recorded on 24.IV.1764 when he was awarded a prize by the Society of Arts (v. infra). Hamilton's marriage has remained obscure, despite certain clues, until published here in 2023: on 14.II.1765, at St Giles-in-the-Fields, Holborn, he (as plain Hugh Hamilton) married Mary Dowdall or Dowdell. They were married by licence, the witnesses being a John Hamilton and a Joseph Holman (the latter witnessed other marriages at the church and was probably not a friend; the former presumably a relative: a John, son of William, was baptised at St Mary's Protestant church on 17.VIII.1736, while a William, son of William and Katherine Hamilton, was baptised there 29.VI.1738; based on the Temple Bar address, the parish church should have been St Andrew's). Known to have been a Catholic, she was probably the Mary Dowdell baptised at St Michan's Catholic church in Dublin on 7.X.1737, to James Dowdell and Anne, née Gibney, of Church Street (this would be slightly at variance with her death in Rome at the age of 53 as recorded in the liber mortuorum of S. Giovanni in Laterano on 6.X.1789: Ingamells).

Previous clues to his wife's identity included the observation in Walpole 1937 that her sister married the Irish painter George Mullins: Georgius Mullin married a Clara Dowdall at St Andrew's Catholic church, Dublin, 12.IX.1762; among the witnesses were "Thomas Flinn, Lucas Riely & Maria Dowdall: cum pluribus aliis"), while Pasquin tells us that Mullins "married a respectable young woman, who kept an alehouse on Temple-bar [in Dublin], called the Horse-shoe and Magpye" frequented by actors. Six months after the marriage, on 30.VIII.1765, there was buried at St Paul's, Covent Garden, "a female stillborn of Hugh Hamilton." Thus the marriage may have taken place earlier in Hamilton's career than ideal. There is no record of the birth of the daughter Harriott whose age declared at marriage and as observed by friends in Rome (v. infra) indicates that she would have been born in 1769.

It is likely that his wife was the Mary, Mrs Hugh Hamilton whose pocket book was stolen from her person at St Pancras on 29.VII.1769; the culprit, one Joseph Godwin, was acquitted as the indictment had confused the pocket book with the silk purse of another victim (he was however hanged for stealing the property of a third victim).

As noted above, on 24.IV.1764, the Society of Arts awarded 18 gns "for painting in chiaro scuro" to "Mr Hugh Douglas Hamilton, at the Golden Ball, in Broad Court, Long Acre." The subject was classical, and further prizes for history paintings followed in 1765 and 1769. But, although he also made some portraits in oils, he began to specialise in small oval pastel portraits for which he is said to have charged nine guineas (entries in the Duke of Montagu's expenses book show that he paid 7½ gns for a portrait and frame on 24.V.1771 and £7/11/- for another on 3.VI.1772 –). In June 1769 he made portraits of the king and four of his sons in small ovals, using graphite and coloured chalk on buff paper; a more painterly use of pastel was employed in the portrait of the queen two years later.

He exhibited prolifically at the Free Society (1765, 1777) and at the Society of Artists (1766–75) from various addresses (still at Mr Lee's, Broad Court in 1765; Orchard Street, 1766; Bond Street, 1767; at Mr Ireland's, apothecary, Pall Mall, 1770; St Martin's Lane, 1773–75). In .X.1771 he was among 24 artists elected as directors of the Society of Artists. Many of the items catalogued have no description, but Walpole annotated the "twelve portraits of ladies and gentlemen; in chalk", explaining that they "are upon a flesh-coloured paper, black and white chalk, and here and there a touch of crayons". In fact Hamilton consistently used an off-white laid paper for his pastels. His technique was quite variable, some of these works being slight sketches in which unblended strokes and even graphite outlines remain undisguised (he often applied graphite for surface details), while others are very highly finished. By 1772 a critic discussing another artist's small oils noted that they were "in the style of Mr Hamilton, who has of late succeeded so much in crayons", although Mr Taylor's work had the advantages of better colouring and durability because they were oil. An anonymous critic in 1773 recommended "Mr Hamilton in Pall Mall's manner of taking likenesses in crayons...to the amusement of the ladies...[as] far preferable to their soiling their fair hands with painting in colours in oil." Apart from remarks of this kind, Hamilton received little notice from the London critics. But his biographer, Thomas Mulvany (writing in 1842, misplacing the date to about 1780), suggests that he "could scarcely execute all the orders that came in upon him" for these nine-guinea ovals, and, reporting Hamilton's own claim, had each evening to pick out the guineas "from amongst the bran and broken crayons, in the several crayon boxes into which, in the hurry of the day, he had thrown them."

Multiple repetitions and portraits of different subjects in identical poses have caused much confusion. Works by pastelists such as Alexander Pope and Anna Tonelli (qq.v.), who may or may not have been his pupils, display many of the characteristics of these early works, and are easily confused. Tonelli in particular copied his work very precisely from before 1790 and made pastel repetitions of his later oil portraits.

By the time of the Westminster general election, 11.X.1774, Hamilton was living in St Martin's Lane. He cast his votes for Earl Percy (i.e. Warkworth, heir to the Duke of Northumberland), whose portrait he had painted the year before, and Viscount Montmorres (an Irish peerage).

The pastelists John Warren (q.v.), writing to his patron Andrew Caldwell from Bath 23.XI.1776, refers to reports that Hamilton "is gone to Ireland", implying that he had failed in competition with Daniel Gardner, to Warren's puzzlement as Hamilton "gives such a truth both of form & colour as makes his works far superior". An advertisement appeared in the Daily advertiser on 26.XII.1777 and later dates for an auction on 26.I.1778 of –

The Lease of that capital and spacious Dwelling-House and Premises, which are particularly rich and elegantly fitted up, the Cielings, Staircase &c. pleasingly decorated, finished by the first Artists, in the Possession of Hugh Douglas Hamilton, Esq., whose singular and refined Taste among the Artists needs no Comment.

A sale of his picture collection followed on 9.II.1778, by Riley at the artists's premises in St Martin's Lane. The catalogue has not survived, but the advertisement listed some twenty old masters, mostly Dutch, from Breughel, Teniers and J. Van Eyck to Van Huysen, as well as Bassano, Poussin (but no pastelists).

Over the next three years Hamilton made a large number of small oval pastels of members of the Irish aristocracy, many for his great patron, the 2nd Duke of Leinster: in the 1885 inventory of Carton and other FitzGerald properties, no fewer than 38 Hamilton pastels were listed (28 small ovals were arranged in the study at Carton: FitzGerald 1936, fig. 8). He also made spectacular full-length pastels of the Duke and Duchess, the dating of which has caused some debate. Evidently made in Ireland, some put them to the 1790s after Hamilton's return from Rome, but his willingness to undertake more ambitious compositions for special clients is evidenced by the much earlier oil portrait of Sir Rowland and Lady Winn at Nostell Priory (1767–68), while the studies made for the large pastels belong to the late 1770s. That of the Duke holding his estate plans matches the drama of the composition with a tour de force of contrasting textures: shot silk, velvet, ermine; paper, wood, stone, all depicted with Hamilton's characteristic economy and intelligence.

His wife Mary (whom one witness in Rome, Henry Quin, would describe as "mad") and their daughter Harriott or Hariot (a Protestant, like her father) accompanied Hamilton on his travels to Italy which are thought to have commenced in 1779. He is not however recorded in Rome until early 1782: on 15.V.1782 James Irvine (cited Ingamells 1997) noted that he had been there "a few months with his wife and daughter a girl of about fourteen". Between .X.1783 (John Ramsay recorded his visit soon after his arrival, on 22.X.1783: n. Ingamells 2003) and .I.1786 he was based in Florence (with a trip to Venice in .V.1784), and was elected to the Accademia del Disegno in 1784. He returned to Rome in 1786, remaining there until 1791, apart from a trip to Naples and Pompeii in 1788. These trips may have been made with John Flaxman and his wife, who befriended Harriott; Mrs Flaxman described her as agreeable and accomplished, playing harpsichord and harp, singing "very prettily", and adding Greek to her Latin. Hamilton acquired a significant collection of old master pictures while in Rome.

During his thirteen years or so in Italy he produced numerous portraits, particularly of British subjects on the Grand Tour. Initially the portraits were again small ovals, such as that of Norton which John Ramsay saw in Rome and recorded in his diary on 3.III.1783, noting a week later that this one (like the lost portrait of Piranesi) was "very resemblant": it was presumably local framing constraints that had this sheet in a rectangular frame, tongue-and-dart inside a flat top edge, beaded edge to a flat frieze and prominent rosettes on the oval punched spandrels. Hamilton adopted this style with enthusiasm for both pastels and small oils. A 1785 receipt for three frames for portraits of the Duchess of Albany were from Lorenzo Dolci (Simon 1996, p. 164); later examples were made in Dublin, by Joel Hulbert. When Hamilton caught up with Ramsay a month later in Florence, a series of at least six sittings took place, each of an hour or two; the diary breaks off at 5.V.1784, and it is not known if the portrait was completed.

Later Hamilton favoured full-lengths in small-scale formats. Most of the full length pastels, such as the portrait of his friend Canova with Tresham with the model for Cupid and Psyche (sent from Rome to the Royal Academy exhibition of 1791), were much more highly finished than the routine oval pastels. The two versions of this pastel have caused confusion. Tresham was acting on behalf of John Campbell, later Baron Cawdor who commissioned the sculpture; the version of the pastel still in the Campbell family appears to be the earlier; its sadly poor condition may have resulted from the journey from Rome. The second version, now in the V&A, includes a number of alterations; its early provenance is uncertain, and it is possible that it is the "oil painting" described at Downhill, Lord Bristol's house, on a visit in 1807 by Dr Beaufort and his daughter, although his may be a lost oil copy by Bristol's agent Jacob More.

In several of these larger pastels the heads are executed on separate sheets (e.g. Canova and Tresham, Lord Bristol). They are otherwise conventionally executed on paper affixed to canvas, while many of the earlier small ovals seem not to have been affixed to strainers in the normal way (the loose sheets are laid on card or board). It has been argued that Hamilton started to make these full length pastels under the influence of Flaxman, who arrived in Rome in .XII.1787, but several examples, such as the Duke of Leinster J.375.1618, predate this. He had however produced "small whole lengths" such as the exhibits at the Society of Artists 1766 and 1767 as well as some "conversation pieces". Like the work of Gardner, these did not escape the influence of Reynolds: for example, the composition of the pastel J.375.1125 (wrongly identified as of Lady Carhampton, and misdated accordingly) is close to Reynolds's Countess of Fife, 1764–65 (Mannings 527); while its subject may have been inspired by Francis Cotes.

Among his other friends in Rome were Christopher Hewetson and James Byres. While he depicted a number of exiled Jacobites, he resisted becoming too closely connected with the faction. His portraits of Charles Edward Stuart and his immediate family exist in multiple versions with provenances that have become confused. Pininski 2022 argues that the primary versions were made in oil on paper before pastel repetitions were made; it is unclear why he chose to work in these medium, although the proliferation of copies in oil on canvas is easier to understand among Jacobite followers who probably shared the widespread concerns about the longevity of pastel.

According to the anonymous biographer (perhaps the editor, George Pepper, an Irishman resident in New York) in a notice in The Irish shield and monthly milesian, 1829, Hamilton was assisted on his return to London by the generosity of George Frederick Cooke (a prominent actor), but he nevertheless returned to Dublin in 1792, establishing a studio at 20 Frederick Street (later 14 Clare Street). His first production, after his return, was apparently a full-length picture (medium unspecified) of Lord Charlemont as General of the Irish Volunteers, which, according to the 1829 biographer, was praised "for precision of form, striking likeness, felicity of execution, and fine tone of colouring." The Shield's source is unclear (perhaps Pepper had it from Cooke, who also travelled to New York) and unconfirmed by any other report (Strickland inferred an oil portrait of Charlemont from the Heath engraving erroneously captioned as after Hamilton; it was in fact derived from a miniature by Horace Hone).

Hamilton seems to have switched almost completely from pastel to oil portraits (as he told Canova in a letter in .V.1793), which he continued to paint until his retirement in 1804, when he turned his attention to the chemistry of pigments. A brief trip to London took place in 1802. His daughter (who married John Way in 1817 in Dublin, at the age of 48, and was still alive in 1828) completed some of his outstanding commissions. A posthumous sale took place at Christie's, Pall-Mall, 15.V.1811; it consisted primarily of prints collected by Hamilton while in Italy, as well as a five paintings (said to be by Rembrandt, Tintoretto etc.), all but one bought in (Henry Tresham bought a landscape by Marco Ricci). A "small collection of paintings, formed by the late Hugh Douglas Hamilton, Esq. during his residence in Italy", presumably including the unsold lots from 1811, was sold at auction by Mr Herbert, at 2 Park Street, opposite Westland Row, Dublin, on 4.XI.1819 (advertised in Saunders's News-letter). A number of his portraits were engraved by Houston, J. R. Smith, V. Green, Earlom and Watson.
