LANE, William

England 1746 – Hammersmith 1819

Portraitist in oil and chalk; initially an engraver in precious stones. He was no doubt the William Lane of Nassau Street, Soho, who wrote to the Society of Artists 12.VIII.1772 requesting permission to draw in the Duke of Richmond's gallery. He was later recorded at 130 Pall Mall 1778–85, 3 Old Bond Street 1787; 59 Poland Street 1789. He exhibited, mainly miniatures, at the Royal Academy 1798–1815 from Hamilton Street, Piccadilly and other addresses.

A large group of drawings (mostly on grey paper prepared with pink, executed in a material which may be pastel but is used graphically like black chalk) descended within the artist's family and are now in the Ashmolean. (The exact link with the donor, the daughter of Reginald Lane Poole, a great-grandson of the Rev. Dr Theophilus Lane (1762–1814), prebendary of Hereford, remains unclear, as does that with the Anna Louisa Lane who exhibited miniatures from the same address.) One is described as in the manner of Rosalba, but comparisons with Kauffman are probably safer. The portrait of the American scientist Benjamin Thompson was probably done after the subject, a British sympathiser, emigrated to England following the war of independence.
