SMITH, John Raphael

Derby bpt 25.v.1751 – Doncaster 2.III.1812

Smith was the most prolific and influential printmaker in England in the last quarter of the eighteenth century. He was also a pastellist.

Despite being the son of a successful landscape painter, Thomas Smith of Derby (1720–1767), he was apprenticed to a linen-draper and largely self taught as an artist, although his father's extensive collection of drawings and prints after old masters provided him with a rich source for copying. When his apprenticeship in Derby ended in 1767 he moved to London, opening a drapery shop in 1769 while “amus[ing] himself in his leisure hours with painting miniatures”. His first mezzotints around this time were so successful that within a few years he was able to turn to print-making professionally, and by 1774 he had reproduced work by most of the leading artists of the day (Reynolds, Benjamin West, M. W. Peters and the Cosways), including pastels by Gardner, Hamilton, Liotard and Russell (qq.v.). He started to exhibit his own pastel portraits at the Royal Academy from 1779 and at the Society of Artists in 1783.

Smith was recorded at 4 Exeter Court (1772–73), 10 Bateman Buildings, Soho Square (1775–80), 31 King Street (1782–1806) and thereafter at 33 Newman Street, a street much favoured by successful artists; John Russell moved to no. 21 in 1789. According to Bacon's diary, Russell gave Smith lessons in crayon portrait-painting.

Around 1785 (the references are consistent with a single date and there may have been several visits) he stayed at Goodwood, drawing members of the Duke of Richmond's shooting party. Apparently the Duke wanted his own likeness done for no payment, but offered Smith shooting rights (the artist was a keen sportsman) and the opportunity to portray the other members of the Goodwood Hunt for 10 gns each. Apparently 19 small crayons survived, anonymously, or with erroneous attributions (notably to Gardner), into the twentieth century but some or all were destroyed by a bomb during the second world war while in storage in Taunton; poor reproductions of some of these, not all identified, are known (the list in Mason 1839 more or less corresponds to that in Edwards 1932).

By 1781 his print publishing business employed some 30 mezzotint and stipple engravers (among them Charles Howard Hodges, q.v.). The subjects, all figurative, included portraits, slavery, low life and other genre pieces, theatrical scenes, and a series of somewhat risqué depictions of disreputable ladies. Despite initial success (his prints were sufficiently popular to be copied by artists such as the Venetian Anna Pasetti, q.v.), the business encountered difficulties. By 27.XII.1792 the Morning herald reported–

J R Smith to the great gratification of his numerous friends, has relaxed from his laborious attention to the grave – and given up much time to small portraits in crayons. In exact and spirited stile of conveying similitude, he has been long acknowledged supreme – his latter heads &c. &c., speak more than in the power of the pen of criticism to convey.

Smith's print business was brought to an end in 1802 with his disposing of his entire stock, including some 400 plates. (Many of the lots were acquired by Rudolf Ackermann, who took over Smith's position as the leading print dealer in London.) His pastels at the Royal Academy that year were well received, but his application to join the Royal Academy as an associate was unsuccessful (his name was omitted from the ballot paper by mistake, and Copley in particular opposed his admission). Although he did not reapply, Smith now turned to portraiture in earnest, working in oil, chalk and pastel, travelling widely throughout England (from Bath to Masham) in pursuit of sitters. For example, on 29.XI.1793, the World reported that “Smith, the Engraver, is taking Portraits in the East Riding of Yorkshire. Those done by him in Crayons have singular merit.” In the Morning chronicle (9.IV.1802) it was reported that–

Raphael Smith, who has renounced the Graver for the Pencil, has recently produced an admirable whole length of Mr Fox in crayons. It is certainly the best likeness that has yet appeared, not even excepting the celebrated portrait by Sir Joshua Reynolds. It is now in the hands of the Engraver.

His subjects included a few aristocrats and politicians, the usual civic dignitaries and a large preponderance of doctors and scientists. The novelist Charlotte Smith dined with him and his daughter Emma twice in 1805, at Busbridge Hall near Godalming, the residence of Henry Hare Townsend (later Townshend), and mentions that “Mr Smith...took the likenesses in small whole length crayons of Mrs Townsend & her two children” [Chauncy and Charlotte, Mrs Elrington]. By 1808 he had become very deaf, and he moved from Newman Street in London to Doncaster and concentrated on pastel portraits in Yorkshire.

He specialised in small (23x18 cm) pastels which he is reputed to have finished in under an hour, according to one critic (Days 1805), who dismissed the crayons as “slight but spirited”. Carey (1827) is probably more accurate in reporting that he would “finish a portrait in a single sitting of six hours, with perhaps some additional mellowings after the departure of the sitter”; he would charge eight guineas for these small heads. Frankau (1902) was more forthright, dismissing the pastels as “notes in colour rather than pictures”.

Smith's pastels display a distinctive coloration, emphasising the coppery tones of an engraver's plate. Like Gardner, he occasionally used gouache as well, reserving pastel for the faces. But the drawing is spirited rather than accurate and the coarse appearance is unlikely to appeal to collectors who value the exquisite finish sought by most eighteenth century pastellists.

Smith's legal and common law wives have caused some confusion. In fact he married Ann Darlow in 1769, and the couple had four children, before he divorced her for adultery in the London consistory court (13.III.1780). Unable to remarry without an act of parliament, from 1782 he lived with Emma Johnston (– c.1802), and another four children were born between 1783 and 1788. His third partner was Hannah Croome (whom Frankau mistakenly refers to as his only wife); they had a further three children, and she was living with Smith at his death in 1812. Two children became artists: Emma (q.v.), and John Rubens Smith (1775–1849), a painter and engraver who worked mainly in America and occasionally used pastel in the early nineteenth century.

Salon critiques

Anon., “Account of the Exhibition...at the Royal Academy”, St James's chronicle, 5.V.1781:

176. Portrait of a gentleman, crayons. The same [J. R. Smith]. Do. [very pretty]

177. Portrait of a lady, crayons. Do.–Do.

Monthly magazine, 1.VI.1806, pp. 450, 452, Royal Academy 1806:

Mr J. R. Smith has six [pictures] in crayons, and they are marked with his usual excellence – strong resemblance and easy attitude.

368. Portraits of Colonel and Mrs Thornton. J. R. Smith The ease and elegance with which Mr Smith generally unites with the very strong resemblance which he usually gives to his portraits, we have had frequent occasion to remark. In this picture he has been singularly successful. When we say that it is in the best style of his crayons, it is hardly necessary to add, that it is in the best style in which crayons can be painted.

Fresnoy, “A transient visit to the Royal Academy”, London courier, 14.VI.1802

Raphael Smith's portraits of Lord Holland, Doctor Saunders, &c. are strong resemblances; but that of Mr Fox is an absolute mirror of the Man of the People. The productions of this artist we have noticed on former occasions, but his portraits in crayons (the mode in which he now makes his delineations), have treble the force of his paintings in oil.
