SCOULER, James

Edinburgh 1741 – London brd 28.II.1812

His father, also called James Scouler or Scouler (–1782), was a harpsichord maker; his cousin John Brown (1749–1787) was a miniaturist. Both cousins are likely to have studied in Edinburgh, under William Delacour (q.v.), and both had moved to London by 1769. Scouler exhibited at every Royal Academy from 1769 to 1784; the address, Great Newport Street, was that of his father. Among the works shown, mostly miniatures, were portraits in “chalks” (1773) and crayons from 1775. A copy that year after a Frans Hals painting then at Althorp is in effect a pastel miniature; it highlights this first known example of an informal pose that was imitated by pastellists in the eighteenth century (notably La Tour, Laidégaine). Scouler produced some competent pastels including the fine portrait of the precocious astronomer John Goodricke, an ambitious composition inspired by the work of Hamilton. A number of pastels and miniatures by Carriera, together with five crayons by Hamilton, appeared in his sale (London, Hutchins, Wells, Fisher, 10–11.IV.1797).

The date of his death, given incorrectly in many sources, is established by his will proved 10.III.1812 (PROB 11/1531, 1812; will made 1808). It shows that for the last years of his life he lived with a Mrs Katton Tregose Smith of Great Russell Street; he is presumably the James Scouler recorded there (opposite the British Museum) from 1781 in the rent books (London Metropolitan Archives; until 1776 he lived in Great Newport Street). An annuity to Mrs Smith of £100 p.a. and several other legacies, including to one Alexander Hemmings, illegitimate son of his brother Alexander Scouler, indicate that the artist was financially comfortable: but litigation ensued between his creditors and his executors (Stell v Fly, Chancery, 1817; the Rev. Dr Henry Fly, one of his trustees, was confessor to the royal household), and an 1850 annotation to his will records the death of the trustees before administration was complete.
