FRYE, Thomas

Co. Offaly c.1710 – London 3.IV.1762

Frye was born in Co. Offaly, it is thought at Edenderry, the son of John Fry (1670–1752) and his wife Anne Harrington. He is said to have been initially influenced by the portrait painter James Latham. By 1732 he had moved to England (earlier than suggested in other sources, published here by 2015), marrying Sarah Kirk at Holy Trinity, Kingston-upon-Hull, on 31.VII.1732. A signed and dated oil from this year is in Emmanuel College, Cambridge: it is a copy of portrait of John Balderston (–1719) made in 1684 by David Loggan (cited Figgis 2014). He is also said to have made some pastel portraits vaguely in the manner of Carriera dating from 1734. By 1735 he had moved to London in the company of Herbert Stoppelaer. Here he produced portraits in oil and miniature. A full length portrait of Frederick, Prince of Wales was commissioned by the Saddlers' Company in 1734, and was engraved by the artist in mezzotint to considerable acclaim. In 1744 he helped found the porcelain factory at Bow with Edward Heylyn, but ill health forced him to retire in 1759.

“Mr Thomas Frye, Hatton Garden” was elected a member of the Society of Artists on 14.V.1760, (proposed by Thomas Apperley (1734–1819), one of the figures in a Batoni group portrait with Sir Watkin Williams-Wynn), and exhibited portraits in oil, pastel and miniature there in 1760 and 1761. He also made mezzotint engravings of his own and other portraits. Preparatory chalk studies for these prints have been confused with those of Piazzetta, whose inspiration was mentioned by Frye in an advertisement in The London chronicle for 3–5.VI.1760, which mentions “The Portraits of this Gentleman that were at the Exhibition-room, shew him to be eminent as a Painter.”

The Public advertiser (5.IV.1762) noted the death of “the very ingenious and celebrated Painter Mr Thomas Frye; a Man universally beloved.” He died at his house in Hatton Garden. His will was made on 27.III.1762 (St Andrew's Holborn), in which he left everything to his wife Sarah; it was witnessed by the engraver Jonathan Spilisbury of Stanhope Street, and proved a week later. Her will, proved 21.VI.1774, was made in 1772: she was then living in Shoreditch. Her brother John Kirk is mentioned (he had lent Thomas Frye some £200), as well as her children, Sarah, Mrs Ralph Willcock and Mary, Mrs Edmund Walton; all three sons appear to have been dead. A pair of anonymous portraits of Frye and his wife in crayons were in Edward Tanner's 1791 sale (v. English sch.).

The pastel of Dr Smyth shows a somewhat loose approach in the chalk strokes on the surplice but the drawing of the face is more blended. Wynne 1977 divides the drawings into three groups: early works, with colour; later works in chalk executed with a light touch, properly regarded as drawings; and a group of chalk drawings with deeper tone quality (executed around 1761, and possibly including those shown at the Society of Artists) which are referred to as pastels. Whether they were executed with fabricated pastels in the strict sense is difficult to establish without scientific analysis.

Frye's later works were original, with larger than life heads often providing a distinctive intensity. His pupil William Pether (q.v.) assisted in the engraving of some of these heads, and was commissioned by Boydell to complete the set of mezzotints he had recently begun at the time of his death.

Nicolson and Wynne thought that, probably through Pether, Frye's monochrome heads had a direct influence on Joseph Wright of Derby (q.v.) during his time in Liverpool (c.1768–71), and the group of artists around him, including the Tates, Thomas Chubbard, and Ottwell Worrall (qq.v.), all of whom showed chalk drawings at the Liverpool 1774 exhibition. Although one of Worrall's exhibits was after Frye, there is no evidence that these lost works were in monochrome pastel rather than natural chalks. The attribution of some of the sheets below (e.g. J.3314.126) has reasonably been questioned, with Wright himself (or as copied by one of the Tates) as an alternative: Barker 2009; Grosvenor 2025.

The Frye 2023 exhibition provided a good overview of the artist's varied accomplishments in oil painting, miniature, porcelain and print-making, but only two early pastels were included and none of the grisaille drawings or technical analysis that might have settled the debate about the material.
